I am a 5th year UCLA student and i believe the best solution to this case is for Microsoft to donate the amount in damages to an independent charity. Microsoft should have no power or influence, direct or indirect, on how that money is used. Rather, the independent charity will take care in distributing that money to schools that need it.

The money, of course, should be used on technology, with no special pricing for microsoft products or its partners. This will allow Microsoft and it's competition to fairly bid for the technology to provide to schools.
